What if Vietnam can't transition to renewables soon?

If Vietnam cannot transition to renewables soon, it will likely face significant risks to its energy security, growth and development, and current economic base, as well as physical hazards from climate change--this could come at Vietnam's expense while its neighbors prosper.

Why should we explore vietnam's renewables road map'?

We consider the exploration of this road map to be valuable for two reasons: first, it demonstrates that Vietnam has the potential to deploy renewables at a greater scale--economically--than it currently does, and second, the road map lays out specific steps that public- and private-sector stakeholders could take to make this happen.

Can Vietnam reduce the cost of electricity by 2030?

These benefits are significant for Vietnam. This outcome is not a forecast but rather a road map that illustrates how national ministries, provinces, and corporate stakeholders could collaborate across different sectors to decrease the cost of electricity by 2030 and increase penetration of renewables.
